It is my personal opinion public land should be open to motorized use there is already a lack of backcountry open to snowmobiling this should be expanded and at the very least stay the way it is not diminished. If a threat to wildlife is the issue then a root analysis should be used to determine the core issue causing harm to wildlife most will find that wolves have been a major threat to our big game population and yet everyone wants to miss place the blame on other factors. As for opening up more land to logging I believe that it is necessary to help mitigate the rampid fire seasons we have each year costing more damage to out beautiful state, habits, and fire fighting expenses. If we stopped or slowed down the amount of wood coming from Canada to Montana mills local logging company's would not have so many issues with taking their wood to market. I have personally worked for an outfit that performed a lot of work for the forest service and at times we would be pulling out wood for days that made us little to no profit this is needed for the fire prevention but the forest service needs to recognize this so local loggers are more apt to do it. We should also stop using forest service funds to pay for out of country research if the research is needed it should be done in our own country by our own people.
