"Multiple use" typically does not work very well in my experience, unless it's EXTREMELY well-planned and it almost always isn't. You can't be quiet and cross country ski when there are snow machines nearby because they dominate with their noise and smell and vibration. You can't go on a nature walk in Denali National Park when a development like "Glitter Gulch" springs up just outside park boundaries. (In 1972 when I worked there in the summer Horseshoe Lake Trail was an easy walk for oldsters--I'm one now--and this lovely trail was blighted by the lack of an appropriate view buffer.) It's hard to enjoy sleeping in a tent in a U.S. Forest Service campground when someone is incessantly running a generator to charge their video camera. You can't run a coal mine like Usibelli in Healy, Alaska (I've toured the mine) in sight of the vast natural tundra views of Denali. Ethics and aesthetics matter. Late-stage (decadent) capitalism causes economic decisions to be made that harm the public, decrease quality of life generally, and often sell off our natural resources for a relative pittance to make someone richer in the short-term while degrading the eco-system and the outdoor experience.

I have volunteered a couple years of my time (probably) writing letters in support of environmental and social causes. I recently fought not to have 250 cars parked 86 feet from my common property line (with five other houses) that abuts the local state university. State employees were paid (in this case) and fought dirty so that they could put a surface parking lot their master plan said they would not build in the university boundary with houses. It's disheartening to be up against a development machine that does not value aesthetics or honoring commitments or planning ahead, and is all about what is good for business. And this all happened pre-Trump! In the current political climate it is hard to imagine that the public will get a fair shake on any U.S. Forestry development proposition..
